Myanmar exile fears for his freedom Burma's military rulers have told the World Economic Forum that it will restore democracy within 18 months if it is given the opportunity, but that they have no intention of doing so during a visit to the meeting this week. This is the first time a General Conference has been held on this island in four years. The authorities insist that they are content to leave democracy in the hands of the country's democratic institutions, but foreign activists say they fear that their situation has been made even more precarious by the military's refusal to reverse its ethnic-cleansing programme. I am a UN guest but we don't know how long we can stay. The government doesn't give us any information," Mr Phyo Phyo Min said. Mr Phyo Phyo Min was the political adviser to the then Nobel Peace Prize winner, Aung San Suu Kyi, before she became leader of the National League for Democracy (NLD). He told BBC Burmese that the army's attitude towards the democracy movement was as if "the game is over". Now he and other NLD members feel they are facing not only physical danger but also isolation and de facto exile from their homeland. "The army has no plan to open the democracy. They will open the democracy inside this country, but they don't plan to open the democracy outside this country at the moment," Mr 6a5afdab4c
