gression and Future Production Potential The field of MLB ADP has been analyzed in depth previously in our 10 Day Hitter article, but I feel it is important to continue to dive into this subject. Some changes will be made as a result of the 10 Day Hitter article, as certain skills of hitters won't be considered at first base. One piece that I haven't seen mentioned is production progression, which is the focus of today's article. Players' production can fluctuate from year-to-year due to injury, pacing, etc., which is why we often look at WAR for individual players in the context of league norms. However, when you dig deeper into bat-to-ball skills, we can glean more information about the progression of a hitter's aptitude. Progression has been discussed a great deal in the fantasy baseball community in the past, but I think it has been forgotten in the wake of the DFS boom. This article will dig into the successful hitter's BP and a few simple metrics to explain a hitter's progression in standard 5x5 leagues. There are two ways to look at production progression. One way is to look at improvement in hitting statistics over the course of a player's career. The other is to look at gains in each year's batting average. This method can be done on an individual team level or on an individual player level. Production Progression Study Methodology In this post, I will be using the former method. I will be analyzing improvement over a player's career in hitting statistics to explain what may lie in the future for a player's batting average. This method isn't meant to rely too heavily on just one bat-to-ball skill, so some categories with the highest correlations will be included: Bulk Up Bulk down Power Hard Launch Angle Speed Hit Pitch This list will include a few hitters with very low upside, however the goal of this article is to document the progression of hitters. This list doesn't include all of the metrics recorded, but will include some more advanced ones as well. Examples of a few advanced metrics that will be considered are Wins Above Replacement and Swing%. I will not be including Statcast metrics and other technology-specific metrics in this look as I believe they are not all created equal.
